The results of neuropsychological testing is used to characterize a variety of cognitive and behavioral characteristics of a person with a particular disease or disorder. The individual's characteristics are compared to those of age-matched norms in order to diagnose the disorder, provide treatment and prognostic information, and monitor the progress of therapy. The ability of the test to identify a specific disease or disorder will depend on both the validity and the reliability of the test. In order to develop and validate a test, an initial battery of tests is administered to a group of subjects with a disorder in comparison to a group of normal control subjects. Analysis of the data from the initial battery will be used to identify tests that discriminate the group of subjects with the disorder from the control group. It is also important that a test be sufficiently sensitive and specific to detect abnormalities in the disorder. This is achieved by administration of the battery to a second group of subjects with the disorder and administration of the battery to an independent group of subjects with a different disorder and a group of control subjects. If the battery does not identify abnormalities in the disorder, then the test is insensitive or specific to the disorder. After the battery is validated, it will be administered to new subjects with the disorder and new normal control subjects to determine its usefulness in predicting outcome or response to treatment. It is the goal of this project to develop and validate a computerized test battery which will help in the diagnosis,
